To Feed Cannon and Gatling Guns England Wants Five Thousand Millions.

Various other nations want as much or more. England HAS the most and will therefore spend the most. The oldest man in the kingdom, Lloyd George, is taken from the management of national finances and put to work finding food, bullets, shrapnel, cartridges, etc., for the cannon, the gatling guns, the rifles.

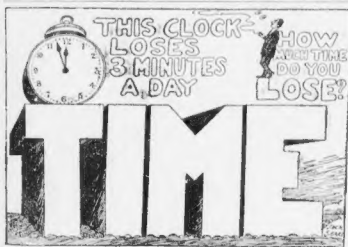

When cannon that are destined to kill human beings lack food thousands of millions are quickly found and spent.

In a million or so of years from now, historians will describe our age very briefly, as that in which thousands of children lacking food, going hungry to school, aroused no comment, whereas the sight of a hungry cannon or the battlefield without bullets enough in, instantly brought forth thousands of millions of dollars.

Young Man, You Would Sell This Clock "for Junk"

Yet You Wonder That Your Employer Is Willing to Get Along Without You.

Copyright, 1918, by the Hearst Corporation

A PICTURE WORTH A MILLION.

Here, young gentlemen, is a picture that might easily be worth a million dollars to many a man—if he learned its lesson and applied it.

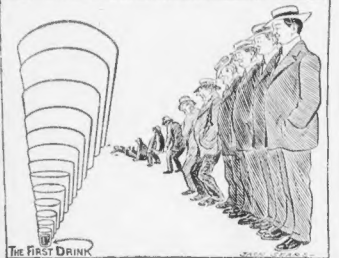

The clock in the picture loses three minutes a day. Sell a clock, if it could not be regulated, would not you be leaving? At the end of a month it would be an hour and a half behind time. Some indignant young gentleman would throw the clock out of the window.

Such a suggestion might say: "You can't forgive that because it loses three minutes a day. How many minutes does a day do YOU lose?"

A clock is valuable only when it does not lose time. Don't overlook the fact that a man also is valuable only WHEN HE DOESN'T LOSE TIME.

Young gentlemen who lose not minutes but HOURS every day in foolish dissipation or lack of concentration, why do you wonder that you are not highly valued and intensely prosperous?

Be sure that, like a clock that loses time, if you can't regulate yourself, you also will be "junk."

DRINK AND THE MAN.

If you drink whiskey, you are standing somewhere in this line. AT THIS end of the line, with the LITTLE drink in front of you, you feel happy and self-confident. If you are number two or three, you still feel self-confident, but not quite so happy. You have an idea that something is wrong with the world.

But has it not yet occurred to you that something may be wrong with you?

If you are far down the line, there is little use talking to you, because you don't hear. You are wondering where that big glass is going to come from.

The big, strong, self-confident man takes the little drink with a smile of contempt for those that advise and preach.

THEN THE LITTLE DRINK TAKES THE BIG STRONG MAN and the drinks get bigger and the man gets weaker and smaller.

There are two good pictures. There is enough in them alone to save many boys from two great crimes.

First, waste of time, which means an idle mind, not under control.

Second, whiskey that makes wasted time inevitable, and self-control impossible.

And Jesus said unto her. Neither do I condemn thee: go and sin no more.

Filtering the Human Race Stream

By Woods Hutchinson, A. M., M. D.

MARRIAGE, after nearly a quarter of a million years' trial, is still one of the most popular institutions, or habit. Most of us commit matrimony sooner or later, and some of us both sooner and later. Pretty nearly half the things that we do, the risks that we run, the shows that we make of ourselves, might be accurately labeled, like the advertisements in the personal column, "Object Matrimony," or the co-sanguinity.

The only aim and result of this anxious concern, this eager discussion about marriage, is to regulate it and improve it, make it more efficient in its main purpose, the producing of a higher, sounder, fitter type of humanity in each successive generation. There's no danger of our stopping it, or even progressively discouraging it. We couldn't if we tried. As the French would say, "C'est plus fort que nous." It is stronger than we are.

But the majority of people marry first and think or find out about those things afterward, and probably will continue to do so for some time yet. And the question is: What is best to be done under these circumstances? While there may be honest difference of opinion among experts, whether the community can be injured by the birth of too many children of vigorous, healthy stock in a family, even though more than can be adequate-ly fed and trained, there is no question at all of difference of opinion as to the grave undoubtedness of the unlimited production of healthy or defective children. For those ought to be kept without artificial limits, the latter never permitted to be born at all.

Fortunately the great majority of family defects are of the curable, or correctable class, provided that the children are given every advantage and opportunity in the way of food, exercise, fresh air and protection from infection and overwork.

Which is a very large number, it divides the majority of families, it divides what they spend money, it divides the time of the breadwinner and housewife.

First and most important among these diseases likely to occur in children comes consumption, or other forms of tuberculosis. This disease is not, strictly speaking, hereditary, in the sense that it is directly transmitted from parent to child, but it is practically very likely to be so.

In fact the only way it can be avoided is by living in a house room, the most scrupulously clean and best and richest of foods for the child from the very day of birth on, avoiding the natural first supply. It is in the children of some countries, especially if crowded together and underfed, that we are most apt to find not only pulmonary tuberculosis and consumption at the bowels, but more than that of the pituitary disease of the spine and the joints, which used to make our cripples and our hunchbacks, were born and brought up in this type of family.

Yet limit the number of the children of tuberculous but intelligent, industrious and otherwise desirable parents to two or three, so that each one can have a separate room, plenty of air and sunlight and the best of food and live a happy childhood in the open air with sixteen or eighteen, and they may grow up strong, hearty and vigorous.

And tuberculosis alone causes not more than one-tenth of all our deaths, but half of our cripples, a quarter of our sickliness and a third of our poverty.

Quite a number of other diseases come in this class of diseases. Tuberculosis is the type, not directly hereditary, but very likely to appear unless careful precautions are taken. The number is larger than we at one time thought, for the earliest tracing of pedigree and family diseases in the course of our recent life has shown that a number of the so-called chronic diseases are quite apt to reappear in successive generations. Some of these, like great rheumatism and bright's disease, are probably special ways of reacting to various infections; others descend upon us, others upon habits of life, particularly the amount of time spent in the open air, whether in work or play. But the point is that all of these tendencies are either preventable or capable of marked improvement by giving individual care and the best of nutrition and surroundings to each child, which can only be done for a moderate or limited number.

These minor or curable family tendencies fortunately also tend to neutralize one another, or to be overcome by vigorous and dominant family strains. So that, unless they happen to be present in both parents, the chances are at least five to one that if this neutralizing tendency be supported by the best of nutrition and surroundings in childhood the disease will not reappear. It is practically unnecessary for individuals with these diseases in their families, or even displaying them themselves, to otherwise in fairly good health and vigor, to refrain from marriage or to refuse to have children; but they limit them to such number and at such intervals and periods as would either impair their own health or prevent them from giving each child the most careful and adequate personal attention and protection.

How Women Like to Be Loved

Ella Wheeler Wilcox Writes an Interesting Article on an Absorbing Subject

By Ella Wheeler Wilcox

Copyright, 1918, by the Hearst Corporation

There are more Jules and Annies in the world, perhaps, because there are more pages than kings among men.

There is another type of woman who gauges a man's love toward her by the amount of money he spends on her. Old blinde eyes to his moral and mental deficiencies, and she flaunts her jewels and fine dresses in the eyes of less splendidly attired wives, seemingly content with her lot.

In her husband's presence she speaks of his extravagance where she is concerned, and reproaches him for it with smiling approval in her face and voice. She seems indifferent to, or unconscious of, the fact that a lavish expenditure of money does not always indicate an equal cost of affection.

More prudent and loyal husbands also designate as misers, and frankly confesses that she could not live with a man who did not consider her comfort and pleasure before all other things.

It is not infrequently the case that the bank officer who is "short" in his accounts possesses a wife of this kind.

Analogous to her is the woman who measures a man's affections for her by the selfishness and inactivity he exhibits toward all others.

My husband used fairly to snub people to get them out of the house so that he could have me all to himself, a "professionally" wife, as woman said with great gusto. "His relative and his neighbor," as she called him, was a man who was very unhappy this man had made every one but herself.

There are women whom too much love renders exacting and impossible of satisfaction, as too much broad sunlight deprives some flowers of their perfume.

"Just think," said a woman—one who had been a petted daughter and a spoiled wife—"Just think, my husband was foolish enough to expose himself and take cold, and I had to give up my room and lost my rest in consequence." Not a word of sympathy for the sick man, only angry resentment at the inconvenience she had been caused.

Perhaps the unfortunate type of woman is she who, from natural tendency of acquired habit, finds excitement and adventure a necessary element in man's love.

Unless her adored one is in a constant state of jealous despair or vehement protestation, there is no pleasure for her in being loved. The quiet domestic life is worse than purgatory to her.

The man who shows a calm security and a happy content in her presence destroys her interest in life. The salt of love is without savor to her taste unless seasoned with the tragic.

With her marriage was always a failure, and advancing years held nothing for her.

After her heavy begins to waste she can feast only on that worst of all dead sea fruit, the recollections of love scenes. She suffers the agonies of death in witnessing the triumph of younger women, and becomes bitter or grotesque in her attitude toward them. But she grows old, and blames Providence and mankind for the misery which she has brought upon herself.

In spite of the existence of all these various types, the majority of women in the civilized world are content to find their hungry hearts on crumbs of affection and to lavish on their children or their church the love which, like Noah's dove, has gone forth in search of a resting place to the end of their bosoms.

While many women abuse the love lavished upon them, the average woman lives upon a kind look, a tender tone and an occasional caress, and repays these with the devotion of a lifetime.

One Kind of Devotion.

"You should see Julie's husband. He does not allow Julie to do a single thing for herself. He looks after the servants, does all the mending, takes care of Julie's gloves—even hangs up her hat and wraps when she comes in from a walk. I think such devotion just lovely!"

"I am sure I should not want a man to show his devotion to me in that sort of fashion," rejoined Annie. "I should feel as though I had married my butler and, forgetting myself, would be talking to him about waxes and his 'day off.' My ideal of a husband would be to have a man to take care of my clothes and wait upon me generally."

"I don't understand you," said Julie's friend.

"Then, to be more explicit continued Annie, 'I could not love a man unless I felt that he was a servant to me. Every attractive woman finds scores of men who are ready to pay wages and to wait on her in home and ballroom—"

"But is it very well. But it is fairly that she finds among these one whom she respects and loves and who is willing to serve."

"I don't want to serve a man unless I feel that he loves me. I don't want to be a servant to a man unless I feel that he is my servant."

"Then you would never wish to be loved according to my idea," responded Annie. "It is all a matter of temperament—most women desire rather to be loved than to love—but I should not respect a man enough to be happy in his love unless he were able to create in me as great a love as he gave, and a tender tone and an occasional caress, and repays these with the devotion of a lifetime."

Then the LITTLE DRINK TAKES THE BIG STRONG MAN and the drinks get bigger and the man gets weaker and smaller.

There are two good pictures. There is enough in them alone to save many boys from two great crimes.

First, waste of time, which means an idle mind, not under control.

Second, whiskey that makes wasted time inevitable, and self-control impossible.

And Jesus said unto her. Neither do I condemn thee: go and sin no more.
